The Prince of To-Night

One of the charitable ushers at the Academy of Music last night insisted that he had once seen in that theatre a worse performance at regular prices than that of "The Prince of To-Night," which was perpetrated there twice yesterday, but, when pressed, he couldn't remember what it was, and personally I think he was mistaken. He may have had in raind "A Modern Eve" or "The Girl of My Dreams," but if he had he did both of those atroctites an injustice. The principals worked in what was cushemistically called the Dorus, where they belong, and they all belong on the kerosene circuit—not where the brightness of electric lights can shine on them. One exception as to the principals is to be noted. Tom Mc-Knight, the stage director, made a good appearance in a very small part and danced acceptably. Furthermore, it is pleasantly remembered that one of the four chorus men displayed a good grumbly bass voice. And, for final commendation, some of the music that reached the audience over and in spite of the efforts of the company seemed very pretty.
